

|

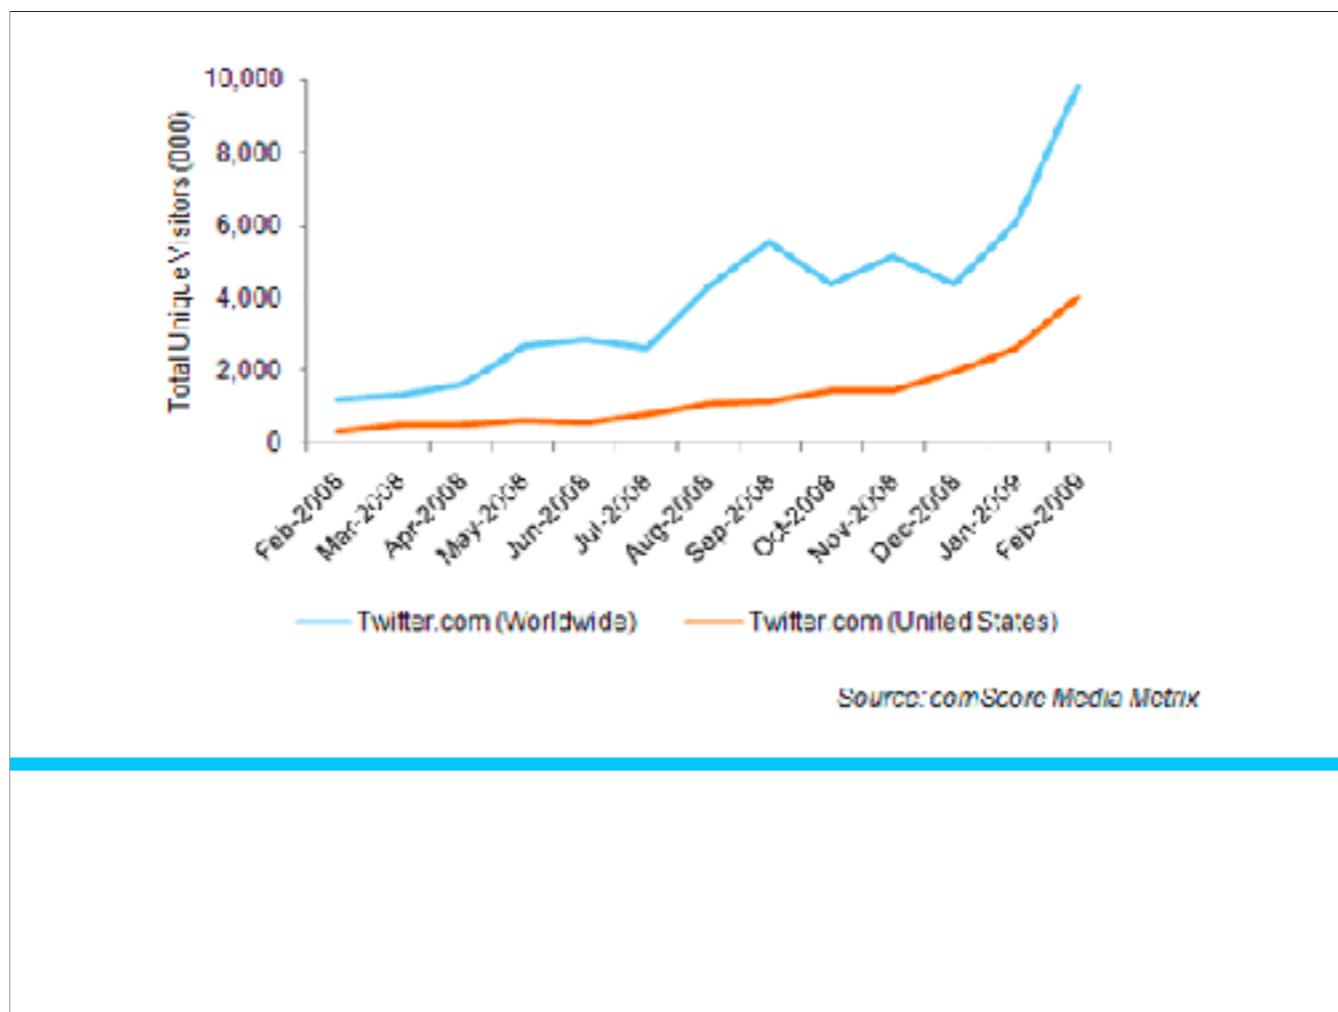

So what is it?

about 38 minutes ago from web

 harrisj
Jacob Harris

This is how I've started my talk in the past, where I've assumed that people attending have no idea of what twitter is and how people use it. This is the basic atom of twitter, the tweet. But I'm guessing that many of you already know that by now. Is there anybody here who's managed to avoid twitter's sudden catapult into global consciousness in the last 2 months? Raise your hand?

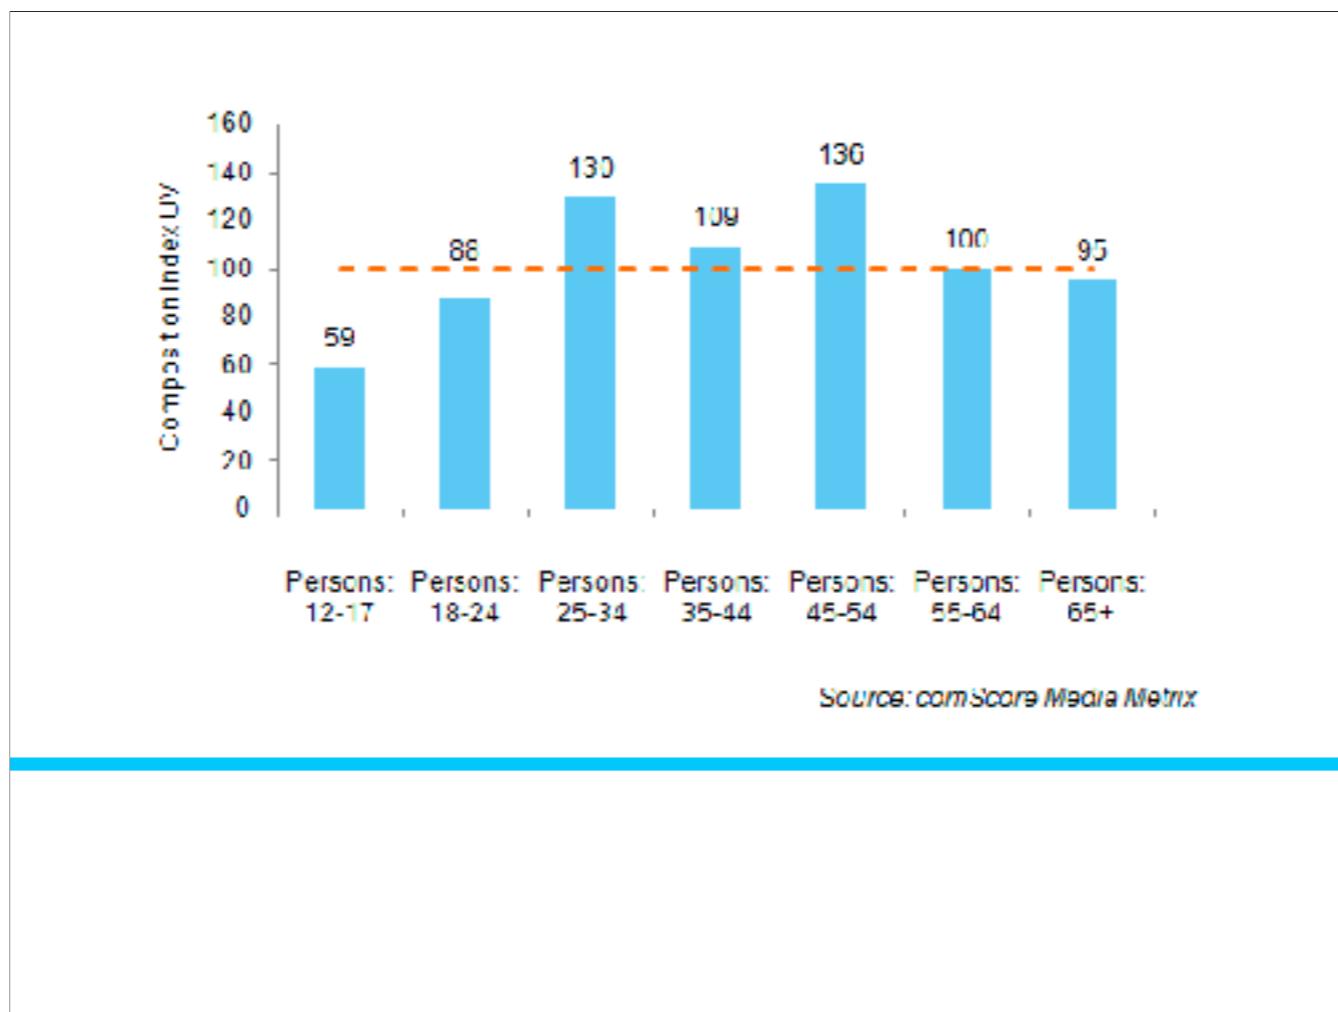

Indeed, here's an outside analytics estimate by a web traffic tracking company, estimating Twitter's total users at 10 million people (note how many more of them are overseas).

This has been accompanied by coverage of twitter from all parts of life, business, sports, culture, technology, even politics...

Similarly, here are articles in the Times about Twitter in the last year. These are articles tagged as being about twitter, not just stories that mention twitter. Note that it steadily creeps up to about one article a day.

That last bit is me prorating. We've had 37 articles about Twitter in the NY Times in April so far and it's only roughly a third of the way over.

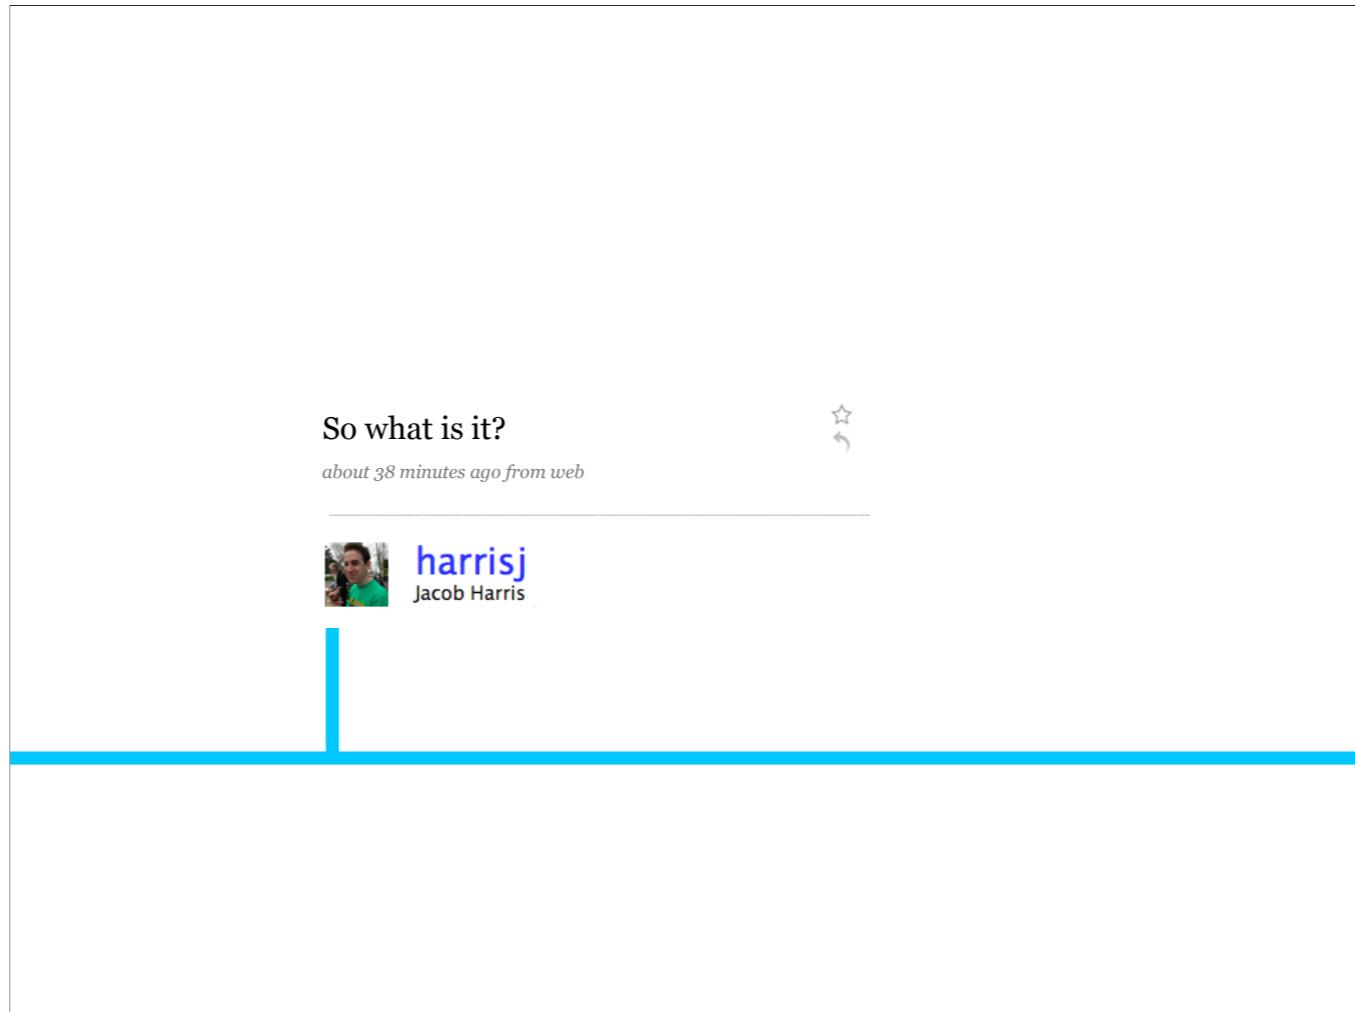

While I'm flashing charts I thought I'd also share this one for people who think that Twitter is just for the young and famous (or those who'd like to pretend to be either). It's not the easiest to make out, but the largest group of users on Twitter is actually people aged 45-54... take that young whippersnappers!

Protests in Moldova Explode, With Help of ☆ Twitter <http://tinyurl.com/c3dpjy>

11:51 PM Apr 7th from web

Lest you think it's all just celebrity fluff and tween infatuation, we are starting to see signs of twitter being used as a serious newsworthy communication medium. Many witnesses to news now tweet their perspectives first-hand and as more people become net-savvy, twitter is being used to organize and connect... and is part of the news story.

But before we talk about twitter as a global phenomenon, let's talk about twitter as a user experience

In a word: microblogging

about 34 minutes ago from web

harrisj
Jacob Harris

Short dispatches that are pushed out to (but not necessarily read by) all of your friends.
Emphasis on “what are you doing now?”

about 32 minutes ago from web

harrisj
Jacob Harris

But what kind of messages?

Twitter only allows very basic communication, of 140 characters or less. So, speaking directly and succinctly is a necessary virtue, although most people stick to written English instead of SMS-style abbreviations.

Which seems surprising, since twitter was originally a SMS service.

How short? Messages must be limited to 140 characters or less. Brevity is a virtue. Whether this is annoying or liberating depends on who yo

about 34 minutes ago from web

harrisj
Jacob Harris

Twitter was launched as a service that could send and receive messages via the website, IM, an API, or SMS messages. SMS proved very popular at SXSW in 2007 until people received their next phone bill. Still, the constraint remains even as SMS usage has waned, much to the consternation of some users, but most embrace it.

Here's what some of my friends say...

the snow is still coming down at Vail. off to grab breakfast and get a few hours of riding in before heading back to Boulder about 35 minutes ago from twitterific

Retweeting @nessence: check out http:// tweetcongress.org (Re: NPR + Twitter)

about 24 minutes ago from web

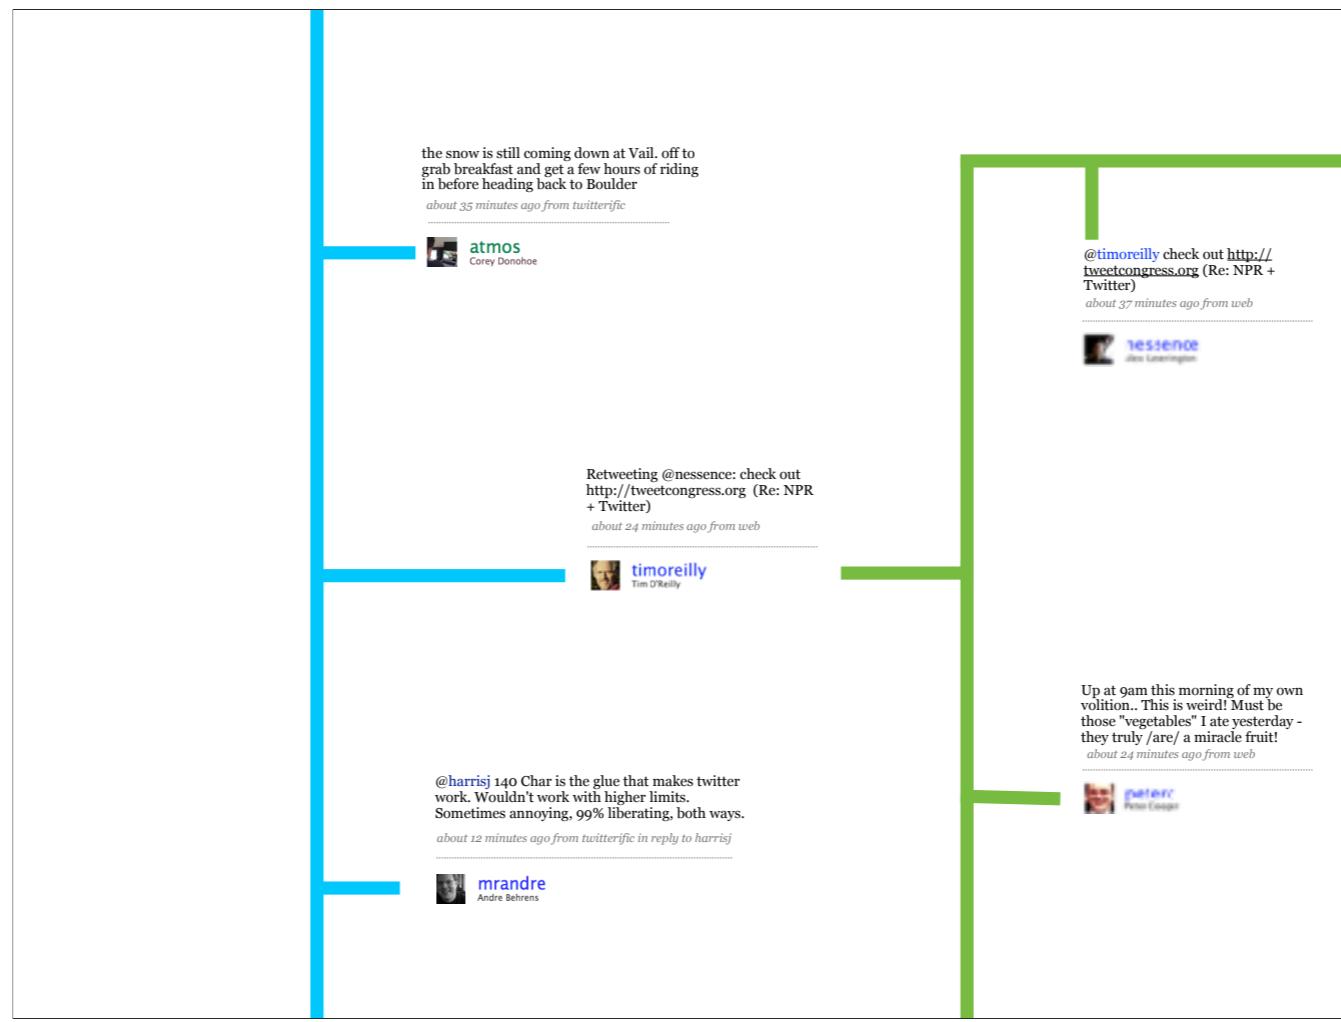

@harrisj 140 Char is the glue that makes twitter work. Wouldn't work with higher limits. Sometimes annoying, 99% liberating, both ways.

about 12 minutes ago from twitterific in reply to harrisj

And of course, my friends are having their own conversations as well. Put a sequence of messages and you have a feed of messages from people I'm following. Here are 3 more messages from around the same time... Note that these messages do not necessarily have to occur within a particular context, like comments in response to a blog post or answers below a question....

Also, not all these people are my friends, but I'll get into that in a little bit...

Furthermore, that is just my feed from people I am following. Each user may have their own distinct feeds and may see messages from people they are following that I don't see (because I'm not following them).

You could think of us as truckers on a long highway with CB radios. People who are following me are within range and hear me, but I may have a buddy way down the road who is listening to other truckers too far away for me to hear. The upshot is I may only see one side of a conversation if it's unfolding (although I can often navigate through to the pages of people I'm not following to see the other side).

Back to Tim though, if he hears something he'd like to share with people following him he could repeat it or "retweet" it, propagating it to his network of followers. This is what timoreilly is doing here.

But what does Twitter actually look like?

Home Profile Find People Settings Help Sign out

What are you doing?

140

Latest: Hey all, doing a talk on twitter on Wed and I'd like some feedback. Do you find the 140 char limit annoying or liberating? I will quote you. about 3 hours ago

update

 jreffell Is hoping to do hipster Christmas shopping on Valencia today. less than 20 seconds ago from web

 timoreilly I especially like the one about imagining yourself as your own successor, doing the things you know are needed but can't quite face. 3 minutes ago from twirl

 timoreilly The First-Time CEO's Recession Survival Guide from @TechCrunch<http://tinyurl.com/6d72pz> makes some good suggestions. 4 minutes ago from twirl

 timoreilly Retweeting @TheOilDrum: TOD Impact of Credit Crisis on the Energy Industry – Where Are We Now? <http://tinyurl.com/69olfs> 5 minutes ago from twirl

 fredwilson The Beach On A Stormy Rainy Day Makes Me Think Of Quadrophenia <http://bit.ly/gek6> 8 minutes ago from twitabit

 liza31337 Seeing lots of ePubs with HTML entities in the

harrisj

142

387

followers | 2,876 updates

Home

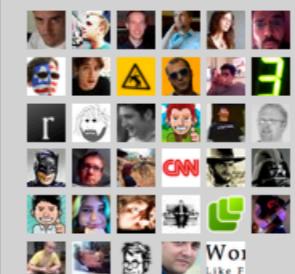

@Replies

Direct Messages 144

Favorites

Everyone

Following

View All

There are a few things to note here:

1. This is a feed, not an inbox. While I can scroll back and read old tweets if I have the time and inclination, twitter does not have something like an inbox with unread items. Instead, the model is passive notification.
2. When you have a lot of friends online, twitter creates a mental state commonly called “ambient intimacy”. Basically, what this means is I have a very rough superficial idea of what all my friends are thinking and doing, even if I haven’t talked to them in depth.
3. Notice the lock icon next to jreffell’s tweet at the top. One common misconception about twitter is that everything is out in the open and public. If you want to keep your tweets private, you can specify that so only friends you can see them.

News Feed
The New York Tim
MIT
Photos
Links
Video
▼ More + Create

What's on your mind?

Share

Jennifer Lee the devolution of journalism into individual brands, from @techcrunch <http://bit.ly/vsl2>
11 minutes ago · Comment · Like

Jennifer Lee Just added myself to the <http://wefollow.com> twitter directory under: #journalist #nytimes #media
13 minutes ago · Comment · Like

Sean Villafranca "Bully Beatdown" is hilarious.
15 minutes ago · Comment · Like

Tina Rolon-Laramee likes this.

Write a comment...

Michael Donohoe Amazons blacklisting of content may not be their doing, rather nefarious third party?... <http://bit.ly/3OBp7N> #amazonfail
19 minutes ago · Comment · Like

Jose Guevara

Jose completed the quiz "So, you think you know American History?" with the result Graduate.
Congratulations, you got enough of the questions right to actually pass my crazily difficult (in my somewhat less than humble opinion of myself) American History test with a percentage of correct answers. Best of luck finding a job.

REQUESTS

- 4 friend requests
1 compare request

SUGGESTIONS

Robert Dob

Add as Friend

SPONSORED

Share with more people

HIGHLIGHTS

Sarah's

Tammy

on this.

1

Things

in your posted

Durand

Sailing

Vin O'

3

2

Of course, status updates are not unique to Twitter. Facebook allows you to make status updates and they recently made the dialog box more prominent up there to emphasize that functionality. But I've never really liked it. Mainly because it seems ancillary to the main purpose of Facebook, which is annotating and browsing your social network. Status updates are an add-on to the social network. Twitter's raison d'être is the status update: the social network merely allows you to control what messages you want to see.

The screenshot shows the TimesPeople social network interface. At the top, there's a banner with a colorful pixelated graphic and the text "that's the save more travel less effect" with a "see how" button. To the right, it says "welcome to the human network". On the left, a sidebar for user Jacob Harris from New York, NY, shows options like "RSS" and links to "My Activity", "News Feed" (which is highlighted in blue), "Following", "Followers", and "Live Snapshot". The main area displays a news feed with three items:

- Andrei recommended an article: Google's Gatekeepers. Nicole Wong and her colleagues decide what the world can see on YouTube. Are they also determining the limits of free speech? (1:56 PM)
- Khoi Vinh recommended a blog post: How Much Is Twitter Worth to Facebook? A proposed deal for Facebook to buy Twitter reportedly broke down over price, echoing Yahoo's failed deal to buy Facebook two years ago. (7:53 AM)
- fredwilson recommended an article: You're Leaving a Digital Trail. What About Privacy? An emerging field called collective intelligence could create an Orwellian future on a level Big Brother could only dream of. (7:36 AM)

At the bottom of the feed, it says "1 - 10 of 75".

Closer to spirit in Twitter is the new TimesPeople social network, although instead of messages I'm seeing what Times articles my friends are reading. TimesPeople and Twitter are also unlike Facebook in that they allow for assymetrical friendships. What do I mean?

In Facebook, you can only see messages from a person if both you and him and her agree you are friends. You see their messages, they see yours. It's symmetrical. Twitter is different in that it breaks down your relationships into followers (people who read your messages) and people you follow, with no real requirement that you vouch for people to be your friends.

Home Profile Find People Settings Help Sign out

What are you doing?

140

Latest: Hey all, doing a talk on twitter on Wed and I'd like some feedback. Do you find the 140 char limit annoying or liberating? I will quote you. about 3 hours ago

update

 jreffell Is hoping to do hipster Christmas shopping on Valencia today. less than 20 seconds ago from web

 timoreilly I especially like the one about imagining yourself as your own successor, doing the things you know are needed but can't quite face. 3 minutes ago from twihirl

 timoreilly The First-Time CEO's Recession Survival Guide from @TechCrunch<http://tinyurl.com/6d72pz> makes some good suggestions. 4 minutes ago from twihirl

 timoreilly Retweeting @TheOilDrum: TOD Impact of Credit Crisis on the Energy Industry – Where Are We Now? <http://tinyurl.com/69olfs> 5 minutes ago from twihirl

 fredwilson The Beach On A Stormy Rainy Day Makes Me Think Of Quadrophenia <http://bit.ly/gek6> 8 minutes ago from twitabit

 liza31337 Seeing lots of ePubs with HTML entities in the

 harrisj

142 following | 387 followers | 2,876 updates

Home

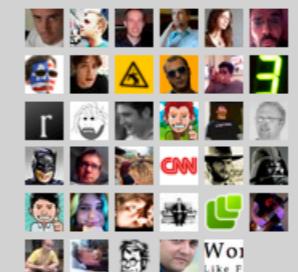

@Replies

Direct Messages 144

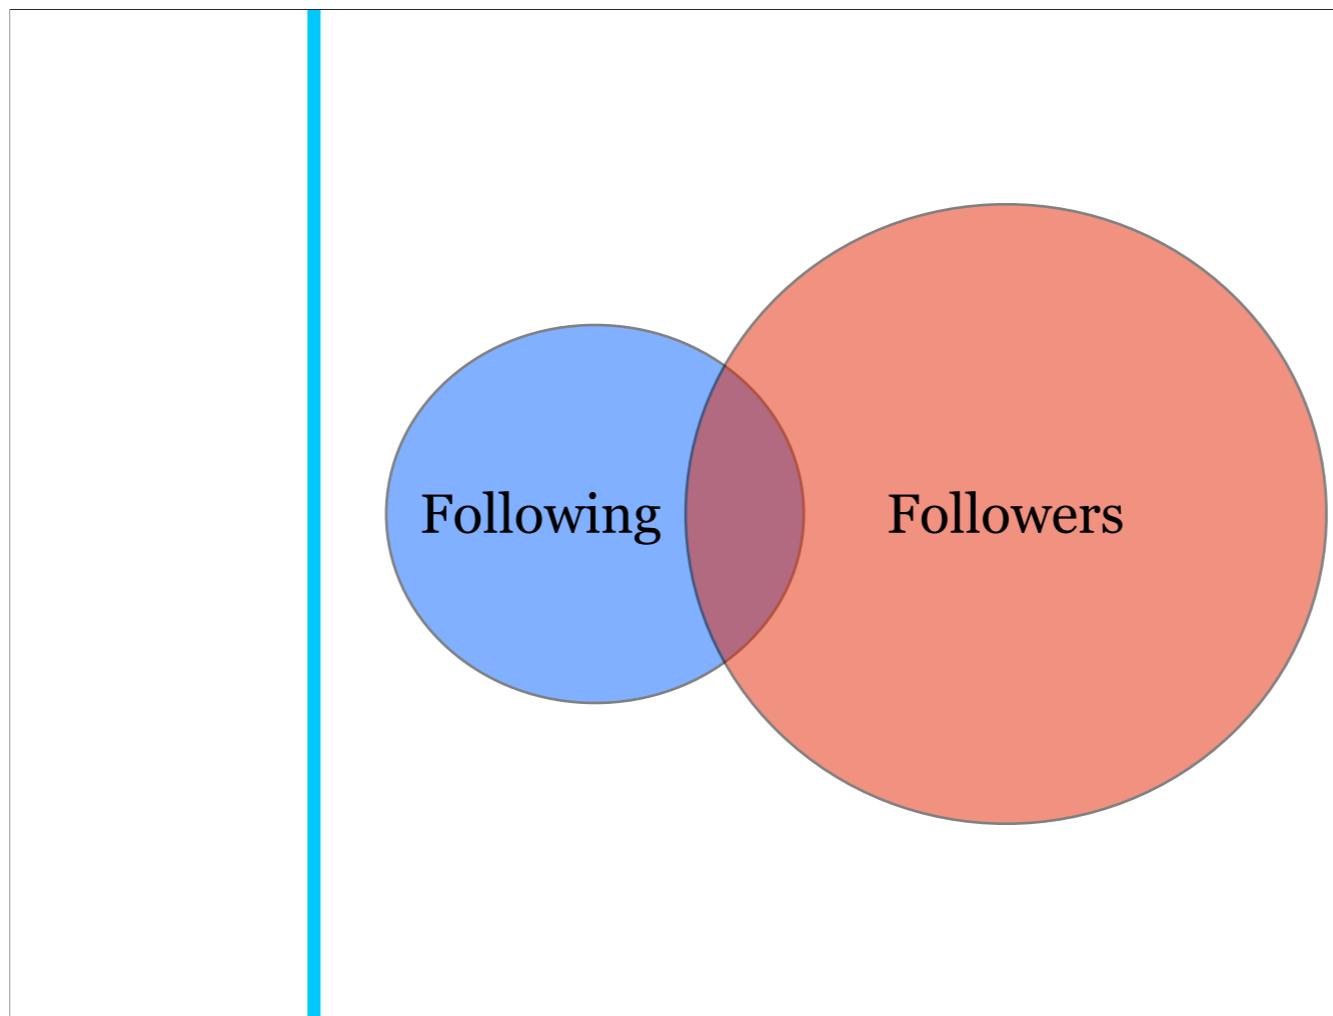

Favorites

Everyone

Following

As you see here, I have many more people following my dispatches than are following me... What's that about?

This does seem really strange if you are thinking in social networking terms like Facebook. How can I be someone's friend and he's not mine? But remember, it's not about friendship, it's about communication. It makes sense if there are people whose dispatches I want to read and they are not my friends, and indeed there are some influential people like Tim O'Reilly who doesn't have an inkling who I am... Or to phrase it another way, imagine you could only read Krugman's Op Eds only if he agreed you were a personal friend of his.

Winner of @copyblogger haiku contest: “I’m following you” / A compliment on Twitter / Not ☆ so in real life

01:12 PM November 24, 2008 from twirl

dannysanchez

Danny Sanchez

Still, the term “follower” does sound a little creepy sometimes.

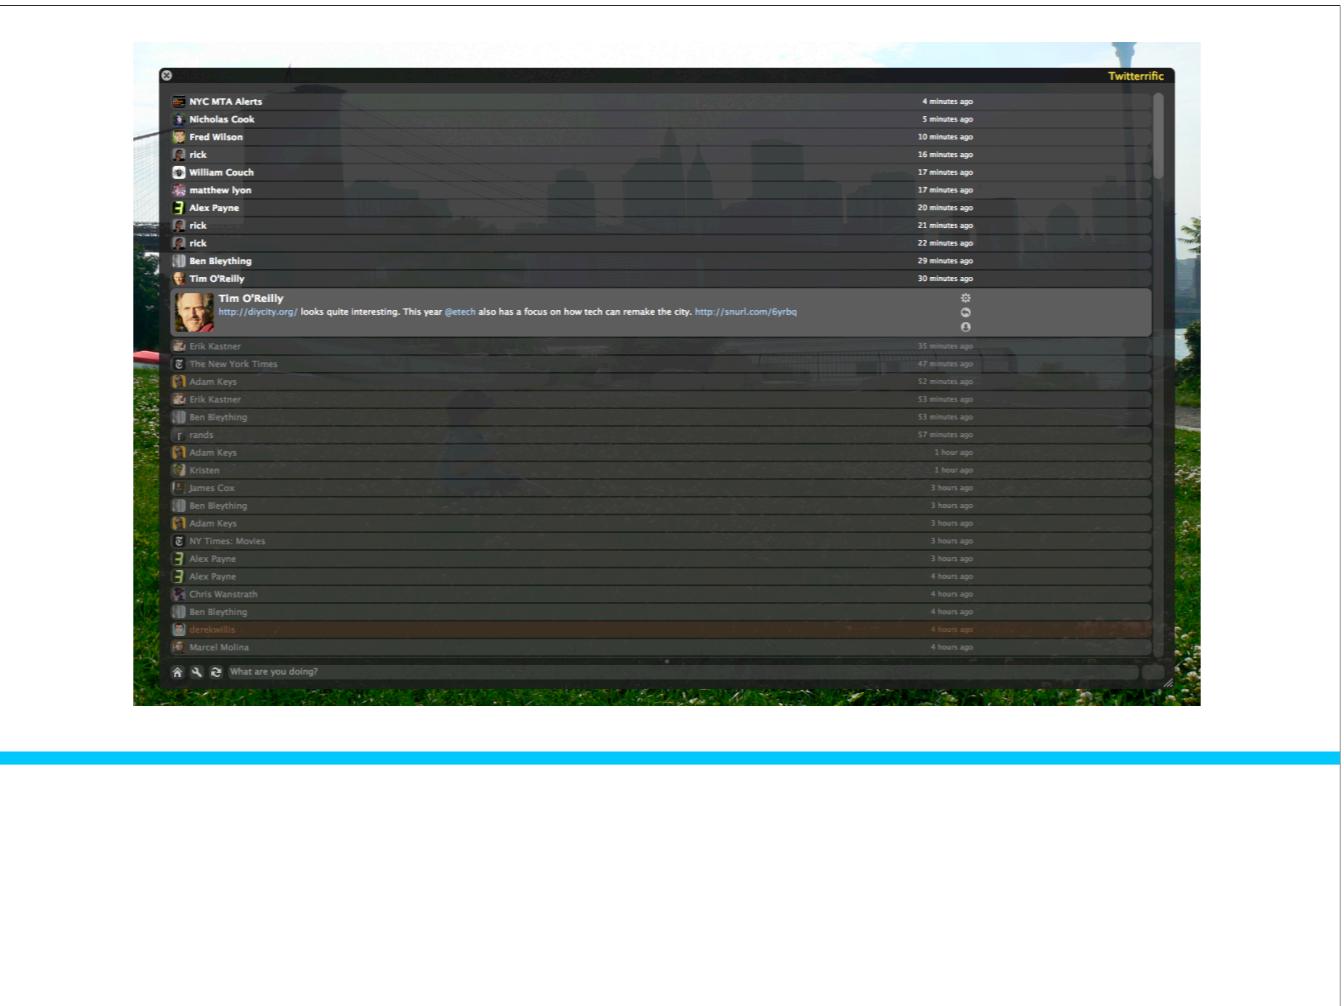

The other thing about Twitter is that it's more than the Website. Twitter was certainly not the only status-update site to emerge a few years ago, but it has managed to fend off all of its competitors (another one, Pownce, just folded this week) because it wasn't just friendly to users, it's friendly to developers too.

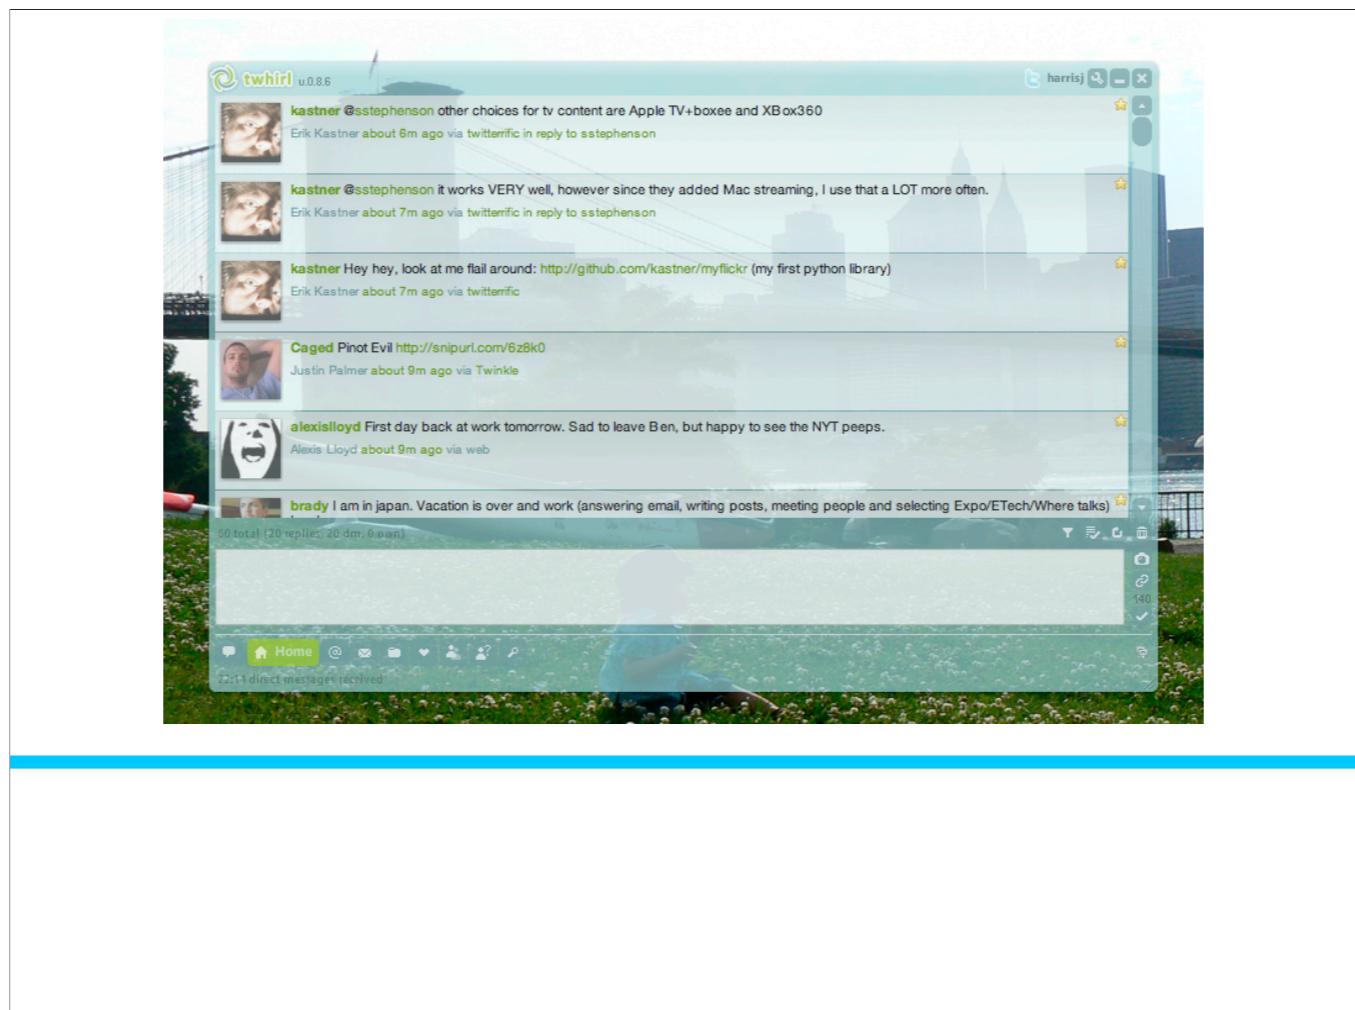

Here's a chart of how people post to Twitter made by the site twitstat.com. What's interesting to note here is only about 36% of twitter users are using the website to read and post tweets. Twitter has a simple Application Programming Interface (or API) which makes it easy for developers to create new programs to talk to twitter.

So, if we look at the other wedges:

- * 29% are using some other desktop application for twitter
- * 3% are using text messaging, while 12% are using dedicated applications on their mobile phones
- * and 19% are other. This includes websites that reskin or add twitter posting, automated programs, and all manner of other programs.

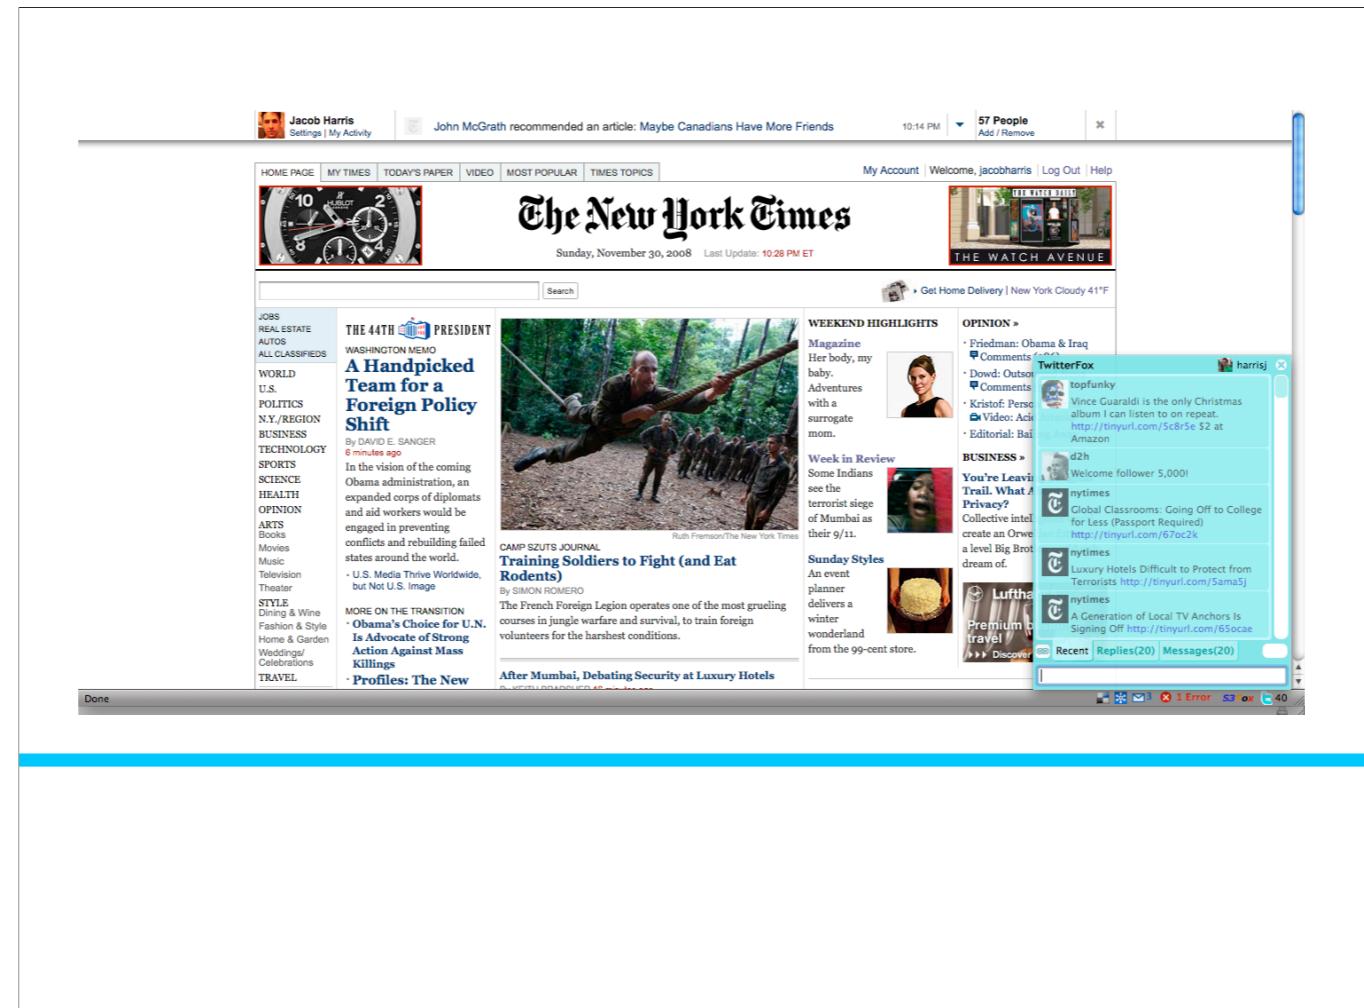

Here is the Mac application Twitterific which has contributes about 8% of the traffic. This is what I use on my machine.

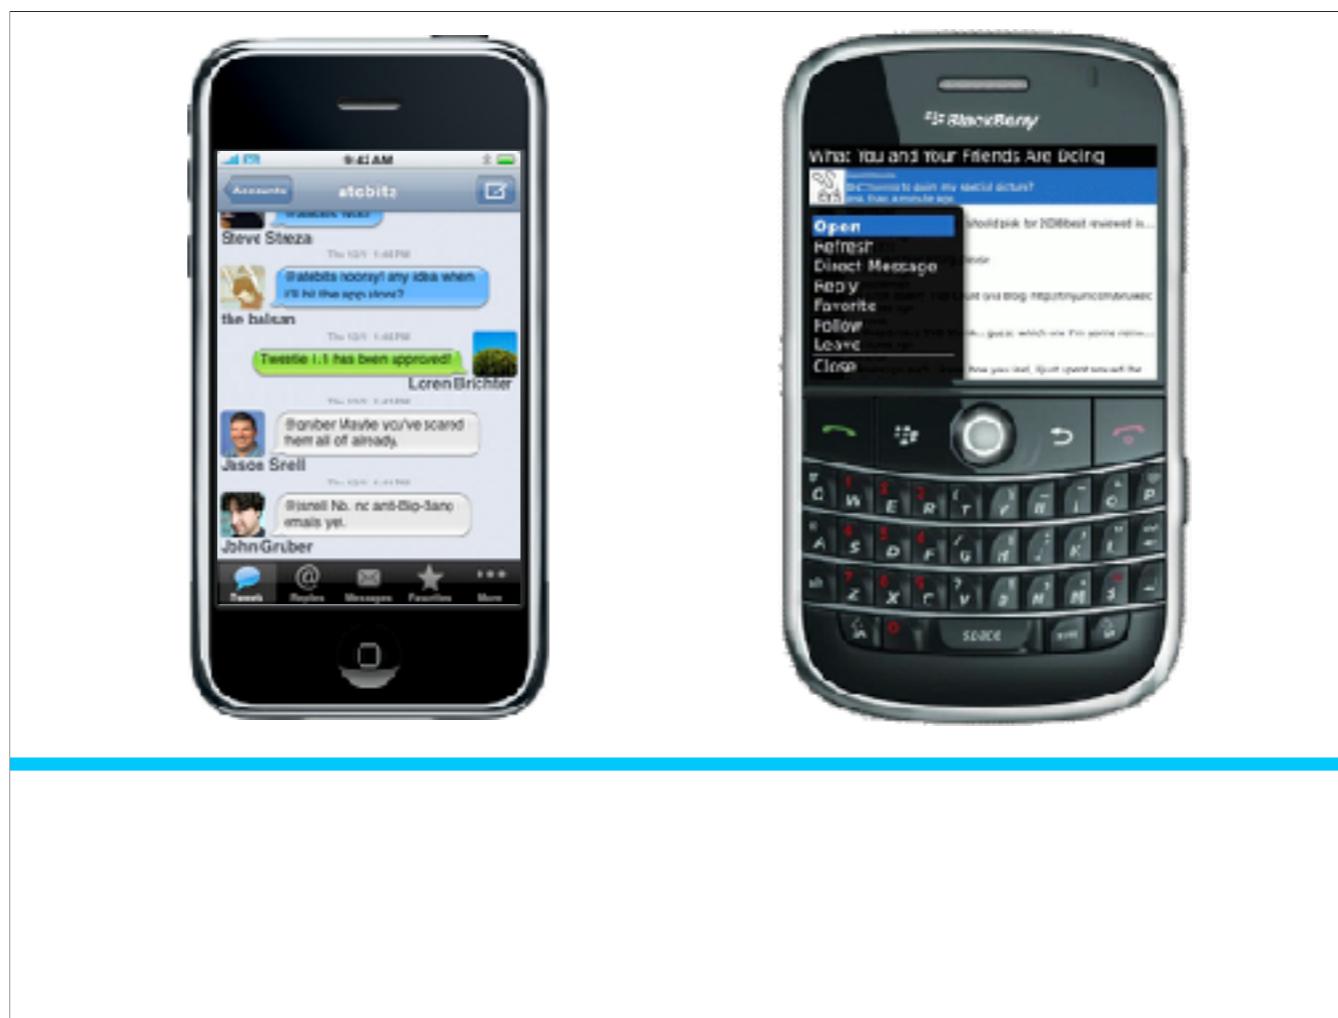

Twhirl is another application that runs on Macs or PCs

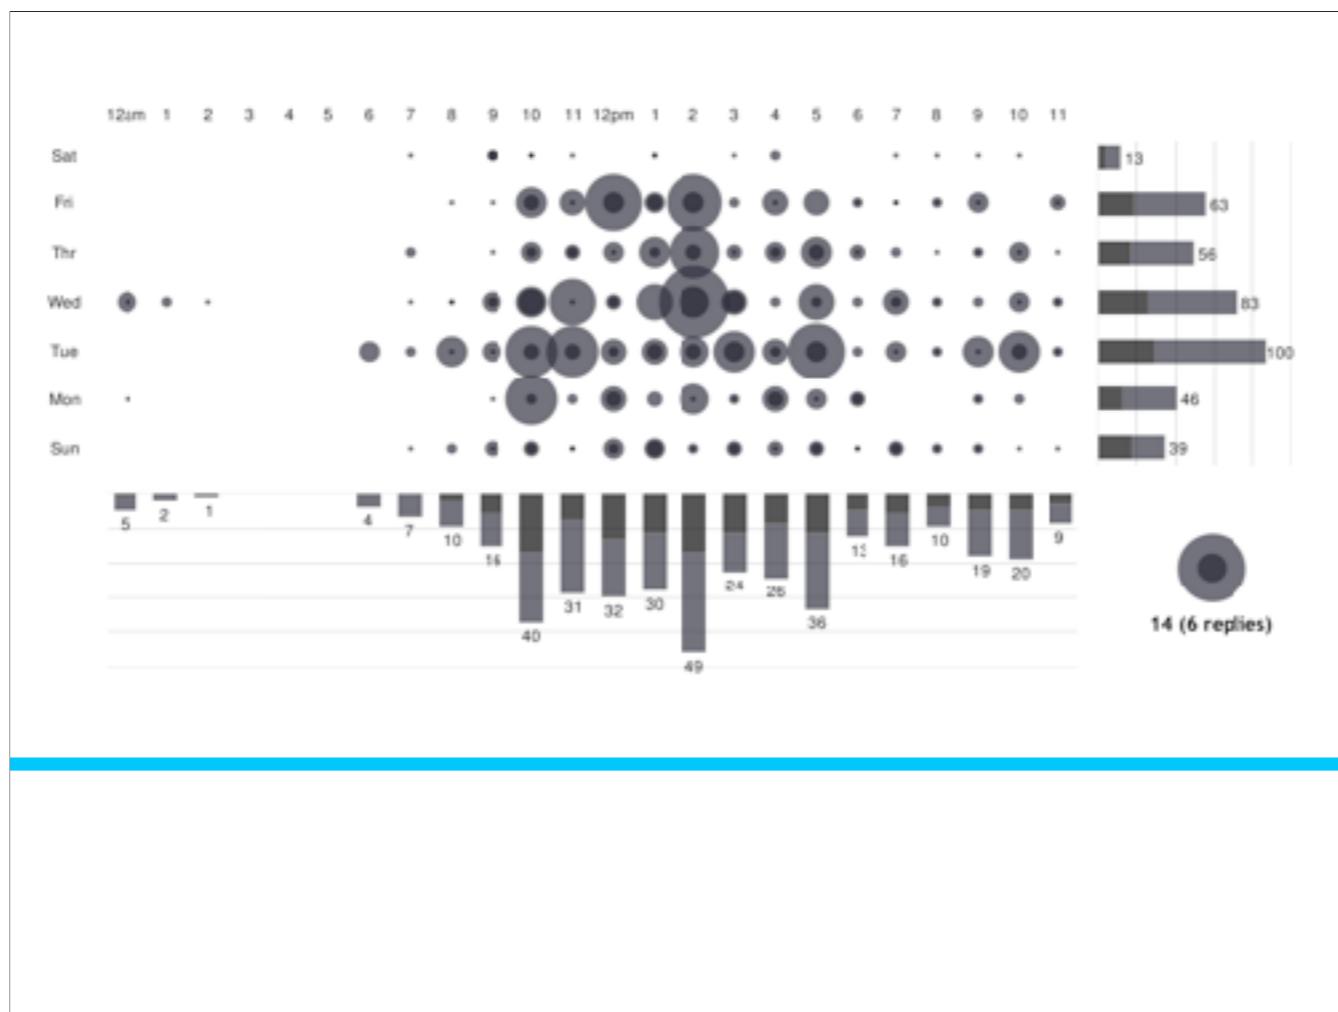

TweetDeck is kinda complex, but accounts for an astonishing 12% of twitter traffic now

Here is an example of the TwitterFox plugin for Firefox

And of course there are applications for your mobile phones. On the iphone, there are both optimized websites and full-fledged applications. For the blackberry, there are at least 2 strong applications as well. And so on for your favorite smartphone.

And there are other interesting applications and websites that play with the Twitter API. Here's one of many that visualizes my personal Twitter usage pattern

Ok, one more from a break "Thank your lucky stars that everything i wish for will never come true!"

LOH
i wish i had a ta, a work study or some assistance.

Finally
i wish Final Fantasy XIII was out :(

Some mornings
i wish the Exchange server would go down for a while so that I can catch up :)

Today sucks. the super sick and traffic is a mess.
i wish I was back in my bed.

At Kelli,
i wish twitter had pic messages so I could send a pic of what I'm eating. Oatmeal to go i wish I'd been able to see the look on my face when I thought this man just asked me, "Do you have an ovary?" (he actually said "a notary")

twistori
The official Twitter
craigslist social aggregation service. Built by twistori.com. Powered by Twitter, craigslist.org, and Facebook.
Get twistori.com.

This site twistori displays a zeitgeist of sorts by showing you twit

And here's a recent visualization done by the Graphics department of tweets made during the Super Bowl. This is the word "Go" near the end of the game.

Giving up on Twitter... ☆
28 days ago from TwitterGadget

jimvanloon

Currently trying to explain Twitter to my Boomer parents. Their response: "Kelly, why would anyone but us care what you're doing?" touche. ☆ 12:49 PM November 26, 2008 from web

keidson

It's phenomenally easy to sign up and find a few friends. The biggest hurdle for most users is usually the soul searching that follows...

The first stage for many users is soul searching, or Why Bother?

This sort of existential malaise grips most newcomers to twitter, especially if many of their friends aren't on it. I am amused by how many tweets I'd see about "giving up on twitter" that were then followed by other messages...

Still it's a good question, why would the world care what you are twittering about? And the truth is, in most cases, the world doesn't! But I bring this is, because there is an interesting point here about twitter. But you're not twittering to the world, you're twittering to your friends and family. And they do care...

People who attack twitter for being mundane and banal are missing the point. It is mundane, but then again so is most of what I talk about during the day. When I'm talking to my friends we don't quote epigrams from Voltaire or compete to create choice bon mots. We make dumb jokes, we talk about the weather, what's on TV, our weird dreams whatever. The stupid and the trivial are the social glue of conversation.

I like to say that Twitter is stupid, but it's the right kind of stupid...

Boss asked me to find out about twitter. ☆
How much do you use it and why? ↗

7 days ago from web

 kellyhn

So what do people twitter about anyway?

debugging some code. what else is new?
12:18 PM January 22, 2007 from web

 harrisj
Jacob Harris

I hate the weather in New York. Oh, what was that? Didn't hear me? Okay. I HATE THE WEATHER IN NEW YORK.
HAAAAAAAAAAAAAAATE.

12:16 AM November 25, 2008 from web

 paisleypear
Jessica

To be honest, there are a lot of boring responses to the question “What Are You Doing Now?” That’s my very first twitter on the left. Wow, I am exciting. And of course, it makes a lovely electronic soapbox for rants ooooo piece of string YOU JUST CAN'T BEAT THE CLASSICS bat bat gnaw bat ☆

SHOULD BE REQUIRED STUDY

2:53 PM Apr 9th from web

sockington
Sockamillion

I suspect that the CNN.com editorial staff consists of a precocious 12-year-old ☆ boy, a litter of Dalmatian puppies, and perhaps a coat rack.

03:42 PM November 20, 2008 from web

hotdogsladies

It's a good place for making fun of things or playing around with identities.

You may laugh but Sockington the cat has 300K followers.

Getting in late. Decided to go sit in a dark corner of the bar with a pen, some napkins and an endless glass of Canadian Club.

12:32 PM September 30, 2008 from web

don_draper

Don Draper

“A Marketing Move the ‘Mad Men’ Would Love,” Aug. 13, 2008

“Don_draper Quits Twitter, Comes Clean,” Nov. 17, 2008

Some people like to have fun pretending to be other people, sometimes even real ones. (Of course, you could argue everybody is pretending to be someone online, even if our online personas are ostensibly ourselves).

Good nite people, tune in tomorrow same time same place, the shaq twitter show (use yo own theme music) lol ☆

01:43 AM November 30, 2008 from txt

 THE_REAL_SHAQ

"The Real O'Neal Puts His Cyber Foot Down," Nov. 19, 2008

And of course there are real celebrities too.

Several funny Shaq facts:

1. He set up a twitter account because there was someone pretending to be Shaq on Twitter already (in a good-natured parody way, not a malicious identity theft way).
2. He now has TKT followers
3. He's one of the few people I've seen who's still using SMS for twitter

Police investigation 96th - 34th St, please expect delays in service on the 1, 2 and 3 trains. ⭐
For more info visit www.mta.info.

about 3 hours ago from TwitterMail

 nyc_mta
NYC MTA Alerts

Water me please. I'm thirsty, so very thirsty. ⭐

12:23 AM July 21, 2008 from web

 nytplant

And there are automated programs that use the API to post messages, for things that are both big and small

The plant example is particularly funny. Someone sells a kit with a soil monitor that can post to twitter (via a computer interface). R&D bought one of these kits, so I was seeing how well they take care of their plants. Sadly, this tweet from July was one of the last tweets. I'm starting to get concerned....

Mumbai Blasts: Taj Hotel is a block from my house! Hostages still inside; still burning; smoke ⚡ is pouring from windows; pics later

09:06 PM November 26, 2008 from web

arunshanbhag

Arun Shanbhag

Time delayed new images from SB Rd posted; Connecting Regal to Nariman Bldg; aka Colaba Causeway; <http://budurl.com/jqzv> #mumbai ⚡

06:17 AM November 28, 2008 from web

arunshanbhag

Arun Shanbhag

Citizen Journalists Provided Glimpses of Mumbai Attacks Nov. 29, 2008

And sometimes Twitter is a source for news. Here are some tweets made by an involved blogger about the recent terrorism in Mumbai. He also augmented his coverage with blog posts, flickr photographs, etc. The result was a compelling firsthand account of how things were unfolding, interspersed with the occasional personal tweets like “Getting lunch”

Twitter also broke personal accounts of Sichuan earthquake, etc.

Of course, there are drawbacks to calling this the new journalism. For starters, twitter doesn't reach where the Internet doesn't, whether bandwidth is scarce or censored. And there is the problem of verification... and volume...

Here is a chart of twitters mentioning Mumbai. At its peak, there were 100 tweets a minute. That's a lot of volume to keep up with! The problem is most of it wasn't news...

army should just storm in and hunt those mofos.. we dont want to know who they are/what they want, just kill those bastards #mumbai

03:44 PM November 26, 2008 from twitux

ujj

RT @mumbaiupdates: Indian government is asking that the twitter search page #mumbai be shut down

06:54 AM November 27, 2008 from web

ChrisJohnRiley

The bulk of the messages were tweets like this. Expressions of sympathy or rage, or Retweets of other user's messages.

This second message is particularly interesting because it's a rumor that was an utter fabrication with no basis in reality besides the idea that maybe the terrorists are reading twitter and we shouldn't tip them off... Fair enough, but the Indian gov't didn't say this. And most organizations (except the BBC) were smart enough to actually fact-check that first...

The future of media is being split into two streams: one that consists of raw news that comes like a torrent from sources such as Twitter, mobile messages and photos, the other, from old media. The eyewitness dispatches (and photos) via social media are an adjunct to the more established media — which needs to focus on providing analysis, context, and crucially, intelligence — in real time.

Om Malik, With Twitter, a Desperate Need for Context

And the biggest problem with the twitter stream is there was no way to see the big picture of what's happening. Even if every tweet were factual first-person perspectives, it's hard to figure out what was REALLY happening and how events were unfolding. It's hard to construct a high-level view from thousands of personal reports flooding in.

Your best bet there? You can guess...

I just watched a plane crash into the hudson ☆
rive in manhattan

12:33 PM Jan 15th from TwitterBerry

manolantern
Jim Hanrahan

Lately a lot of the discussion of twitter and the news is how twitter “scoops” the major media. In some sense, this is nothing new. Eyewitnesses at events will always scoop news organizations. But before they might just call a few friends, tell some coworkers. Now they’re on a public stage...

<http://twitpic.com/135xa> - There's a plane in the Hudson. I'm on the ferry going to pick up the people. Crazy.

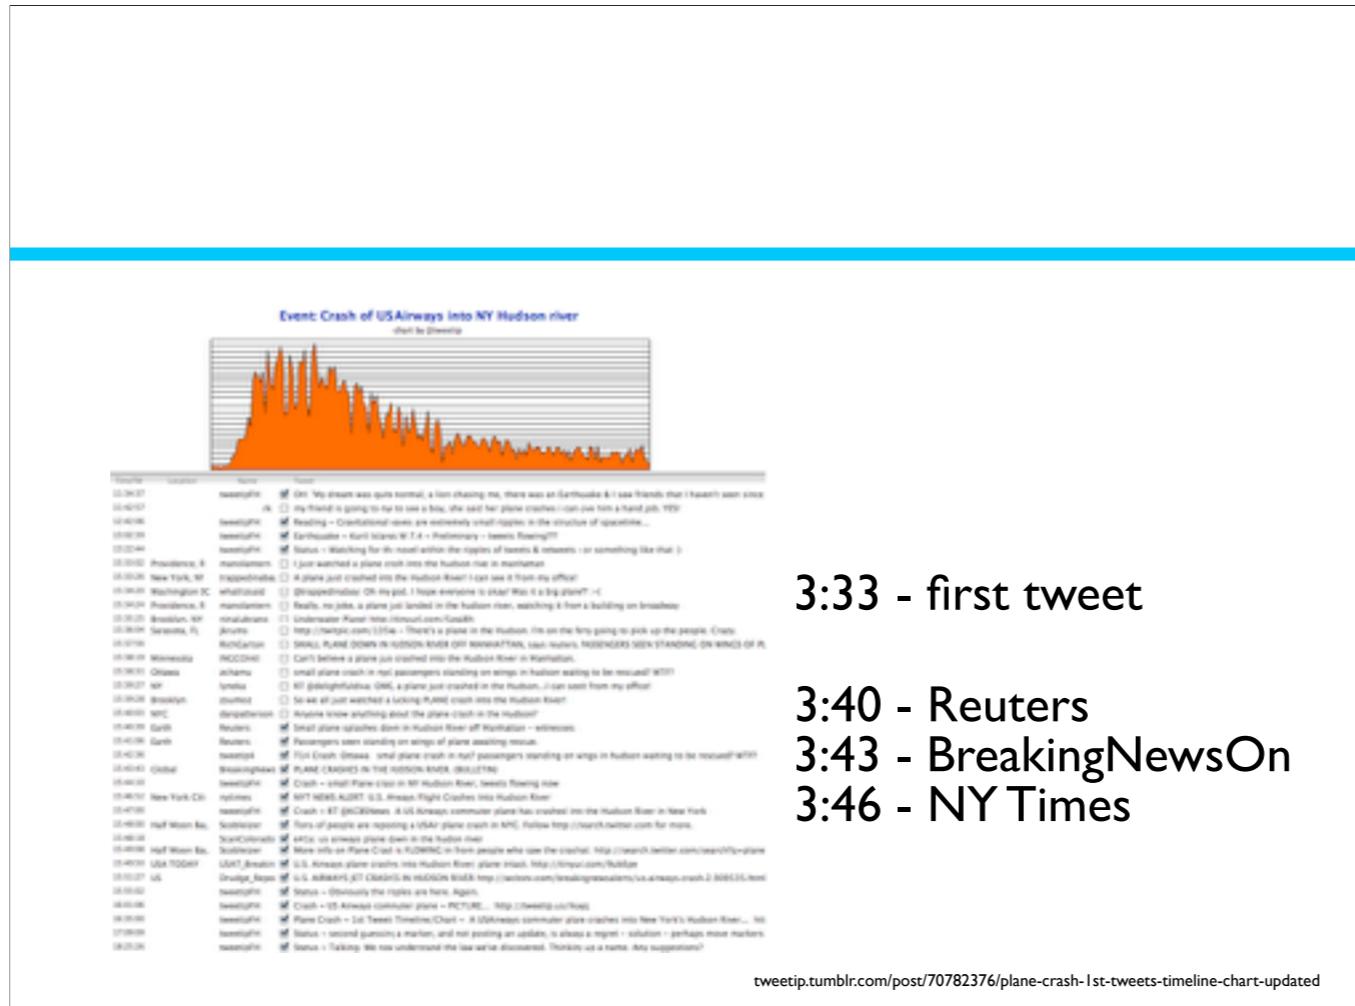

12:36 PM Jan 15th from TwitPic

jkrums
Janis Krums

And of course, twitter sometimes is part of the news. This is a tweet that got a lot of attention in the aftermath of the US Airways crash, because it showed the new ways in which twitter, cell phones, and eye witnesses are intersecting with how we report the news. More on that later in the talk.

3:33 - first tweet

3:40 - Reuters

3:43 - BreakingNewsOn
3:46 - NY Times

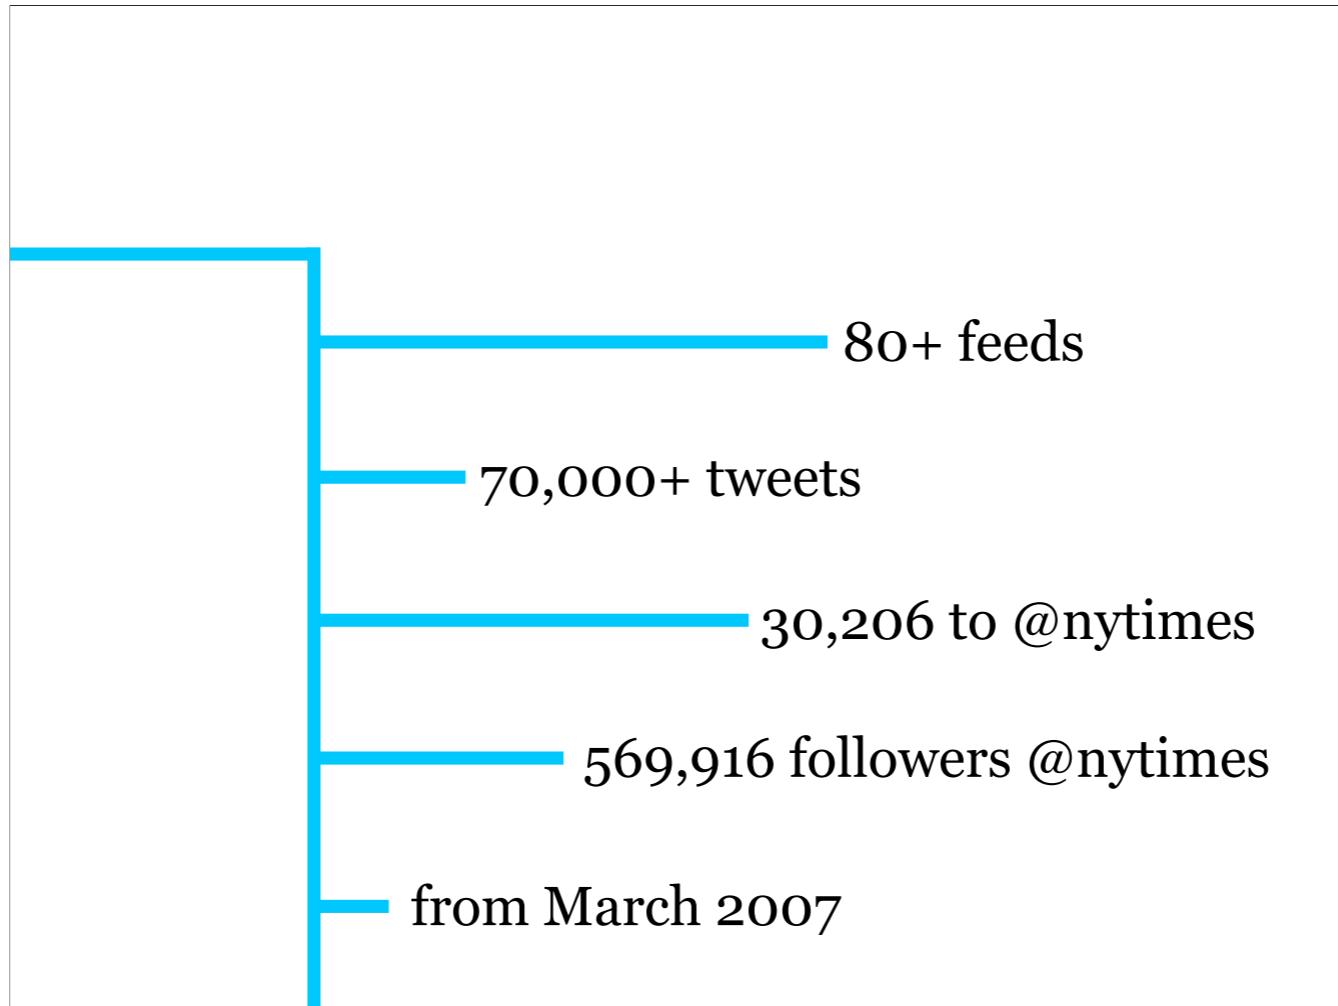

But let's put things in perspective.

At Least 16 Dead in India in Coordinated Attacks ☆
<http://tinyurl.com/5pggch>

03:39 PM November 26, 2008 from web

Of course, we are on twitter too... this is the first mention of the Mumbai attacks from the @nytimes twitter account, which is an automated feed of articles posted to the homepage. We also have similar automated accounts for all sections and many blogs. As the story developed on the website, further articles were also posted to the feed.

To give you an idea of numbers, here's information on how long the NY Times has been on twitter and what all our feeds have been doing.

Mediator Says Ransom Deal Has Been Reached for Pirated Ukrainian Freighter <http://tinyurl.com/699e3u>

about 22 hours ago from web

WNYC host Brian Lehrer will be taking reader questions on City Room this week. We'll start taking questions at 6:30 Monday.

about 22 hours ago from web

There are feeds for the newspaper and feeds for blogs.

And we also recently added Breaking News Alerts.

The biggest relief was just being able to talk to each other normally, without sounding like Alvin and the Chipmunks. ☆ ↗ <http://bit.ly/divers>

about 1 hour ago from web

palafo
Patrick LaForge

4:29 PM Feb 19th from web

nytimeskristof
Nicholas Kristof

Bunking with George Clooney, sharing a tiny room in Chad near Darfur. Mattresses on the floor, and the shower is a hose that doesn't work. ☆ ↗

What might be next for the New York Times on Twitter?

10 seconds ago from inside the room

harrisj
Jacob Harris

JP: Dirge hour at Cake Shop. Upstairs bitter acoustic ballads of King Darves. ☆ Downstairs glacial electric laments by Castanets. OK, bummed.

06:02 PM October 24, 2008 from txt nytimesartsbeat

w. va. went for mccain, in projections, and neighbor pa. for obama. whither OHIO????/katephillips

09:24 PM November 04, 2008 from twirl

One possibility would be live-tweeting instead of live-blogging (we could figure out how to feed into the live-blog post potentially). As some examples, here is ArtsBeat describing one part of their total CMJ music marathon experience. And Kate Phillips from The Caucus did some live tweets on election nights and during the debates. Since there will be conversation on twitter around major world events, the idea here is to be a part of it. It's of course easier when the event is scheduled (the Olympics, election) vs. breaking news...

self-promotional pimping: newspapers shooting their way out of box canyon might have shot themselves in the foot. ☆ <http://tinyurl.com/c7xqcc>

19 minutes ago from web

carr2n

david carr

@vpynchon I suspect you're probably right. Who's smart on the subject of online ☆ communities? Looking for sources...

03:02 PM November 21, 2008 from web in reply to vpynchon

brianstelter

One other thing that might be interesting would be journalists twittering. People like having a connection with the journalists of the NY Times and some level of transparency (as long as it didn't violate ethical or publishing standards of course) might be engaging to the journalist who's able to directly communicate with his readers...

Here are 2 journalists at the Times who twitter already...

RT @Ceziceu: Police attacks ★
protesters!!!!!!!1 #PMAN

4:45 PM Apr 7th from TweetDeck

 evisoft
Vitalie Eșanu

At circle line pier I think every fire and police unit is here. Landed about 41st street ★

12:59 PM Jan 15th from TwitterFon

 hdueitt
Heather Dueitt

One other possibility might be to use twitter as a tool for reporting, with the caveats from Mumbai in mind. On the left, you can see Brian Stelter talking to his readers directly to get leads for a sidebar where several celebrities who twitter were mentioned. This is an excellent channel for talking to readers, since his followers are friends, family, and fans, and this would not work so well on the TV Decoder blog.

The right case is also a little interesting, as it's part of the saga on the Motrin Moms. To give you a backstory, Motrin posted an advertisement in which a female voiceover snarkily suggested that baby wearing had become a fashionable accessory used by moms desperate to show they're "official" and then tried to sell them painkillers. They forgot Advertising Rule #17: Never Patronize the Mommy Bloggers. And so a protest backlash developed online over the week with many people branding their posts #motrinnmoms to show their affiliation (or their argument against). 2 days later Motrin backed down, pulled the ad, and apologized. Yeah, it was a bit of tempest in a teacup, but it was interesting how I saw this story develop because the #motrinnmoms tag started showing up in my feed. And it surged to be the most popular keyword on twitter on that weekend. In this case, Lisa Belkin of the Motherlode blog followed it to a story.

I think this case is interesting because here twitter was part of the news, but in a way that spoke to its strengths, allowing technically-sophisticated and socially-connected mommy bloggers to coordinate their protest on Motrin, rather than bystanders expressing their passive rage or sending along rumors. The twitterers were the story, and I think we'll see more of this as protest movements both large and trivial get organized electronically. Obviously this is more likely to be savvy web moms rather than monks in Myanmar, but I'm curious to see where it goes.

The New York Times

In this talk, I'm going to tell you what twitter is, look at some of the ways people use it, and finally tell you about how we're using it here at the Times.